

SECOND LIGHT POETRY COMPETITION 2015

JUDGE: MYRA SCHNEIDER: PRIZE WINNERS

Judge's comment: I went through over a thousand poems looking for poems which travelled, paid attention to form and really made words work. Eventually I reduced a long list of 101 poems to 26 which I was determined to pick out and by this time I was very excited because the winning poems were telling me loud and clear which they were!

Myra Schneider

Short Poem First Prize Winner: Carolyn King

Souvenir

He's playing God again: puffing out his cheeks
like the great north wind in a fairy tale; breathing life into a shapeless blob. Immaculate conception.

And now I see the bird before it's hatched; watch
as he thrusts his canna da soffio into the furnace:
genesis – before my very eyes!

When he plunges it into cold water, I freeze.
Baptism by fire – a hiss of steam rising from amorphous silica: life in the raw.

In the city, shapely gondolas snake
along shot-silk waterways;
sunlight glances through stained-glass windows.

I'm in another world – intense with the heat
and passion of giving birth as he breathes again
into the blowpipe; watching the bubble

of molten glass, seeing him reach for the forceps
he calls borselle to coax the emerging shape
of a tiny bird out of its red-hot nest.

Under the scagno, his work-bench, I glimpse
the broken wings and malformed heads
of the imperfect ones;

fragments of twisted perfume bottles
glinting like jewels
on the unswept floor beside the furnace.

They remind me of home
and the wastepaper basket under the desk brimming over with shredded poems –

the ones I sometimes wish I hadn't thrown away,
as they gnaw at my heart and stick in my craw
like little glass splinters under my skin.

He shakes his head.
I'm crying now; begging him not to reject
the tiny misshapen form.

He tosses it, still warm, in my direction.
"Mine?" I ask. But he's already back at the glory-hole,
the glare of mass production Murano-style.

And I shall carry it home swaddled in cotton-wool,
as tenderly as I carried home my first-born
from the hospital.

I'm used to this – unflappable;
stroking the flattened head,
meeting the glassy stare,

pressing my lips to the rara avis;
whispering
"We shall fly!"

previously published in South magazine, Carolyn King 'Poet Profile', Autumn 2013.

Long Poem First Prize Winner: Margaret Wilmot

Editors' note: November Journal is a sequence of 30 14-line poems, one for each day in November, reflecting on events and memories of events in the poet's life. These extracts can only give a flavour of the whole.

November Journal (extracts)

Names As Building-Blocks (1 November)

The new carer has a way of saying a name
so lovingly that she evokes all that is most beautiful about that person, conjures Brian or Jack into a warm presence. They are there – and there
...

Huachinango (2 November)

When Mother came home from Mexico, words were her best souvenir. Even then, so long ago, it was the sound which gave her mind delight. I'm sure she always ate red snapper because she loved its name – huachinango.
...

In The Beginning (29 November)

Get it clear in your mind. Get it down. Words.
It's words which have the energy, given their own space,
to let go. Take off. Like kids. Or swallows.
We don't always know where they're going but
...

Early Train On St. Andrew's Day (30 November)

Once I waited in the bitter wind to file past his skull and little finger. Women had great candles, stood barefoot, or inched forward on their knees.
This was the day the children were late home, happy
from a bun-feast for their House-saint.
A friend's birthday too. Each day echoes.
Frost covers the fields; sheep congregate in a patch of sun.
Nearby two kids are chatting. Politics and Economics do connect, really, the girl assures the boy. At Music College, he begins.
I miss the music, said Mother recently, grandsons away.
Cloud has piled itself on a high wind-shelf, is streaked with early sun. It looks like Tiepolo. I'd like to go back to those churches in Venice, I tell my husband.
I didn't appreciate them when I was young...

an excerpt of the poem was first published in Scintilla, 2008